options to explore for whom they can become as identity development progresses. Adolescents are expected to make choices and commit to options within the confines of their social contexts. Identity formation involves three key tasks: discovering and developing one's potential, choosing one's purpose in life, and finding opportunities to exercise that potential and purpose. Adolescents are expected to make choices and commit to options within the confines of their social contexts.

1. Identify key developmental mechanisms that are both common and unique across identity development. We sought to address the questions why, when, and how does identity develop?

2. Develop a model of identity content that integrates existing approaches. We first review adolescents' development of self and identity, linking the behavioral and neural levels. We then outline the general value-based decision-making approach and describe the predictions of this model in the context of adolescent development.

Identity formation also called identity development or identity construction is a complex process in which humans develop a clear and unique view of themselves and of their identity. Self-concept, personality development, and values are all closely related to identity formation. Individuation is also a critical part of identity formation.

Synthesizing research on the development of identity, we show that identity development during adolescence and early adulthood is characterized by both systematic maturational and substantial stability while many core notions of Erikson's psychosocial theory of identity development.
development such as the identity status model based on the processes of exploration and commitment continue to have empirical support. New theoretical work has elaborated both the processes and the contents of identity by bridging developmental and social psychological streams. Upon these two pillars, we sought to unravel how identities are formed and changed over time and how identity processes are genuinely social by being embedded in social contexts. In this review, we address the steps taken to reach this goal.

Identity development is discussed within the context of Erik Erikson's developmental theory as the resolution of the psychosocial stage accompanying adolescence. Childhood precursors to identity within Erikson's theory include relations theory and classical analytic theory. These theories are described to explain the importance of peers in adolescence. Developmental tasks of adolescence include learning about the self in work roles and contexts. Just as one learns about the job itself, meaningful work validates the self and provides inclusion. Furthermore, some aspects of development and learning occur unconsciously. Identity development is a lifelong process that involves defining your beliefs, values, and sense of self. Our understanding of identity development is primarily influenced by psychologist and psychoanalyst Erik Erikson, who theorized that identity formation is the critical task of development in adolescence. Seagulls Don't Fly into the Bush: Cultural Identity and Development in Melanesia by Wadsworth Modern Anthropology Library

Published 1994, Psychology. It is organized into five sections: an introduction that lays out major conceptual issues followed by four topical areas: the cultural organization of early experience, language and socialization, self-development and cognitive development. Although issues concerning moral development and the value-laden nature of mental functioning are also addressed. Section I, Introduction, provides a primer on identification for development that we hope is useful for development practitioners and others who are new to thinking about identification and for identity experts who are new to thinking about development.
